FREE COAL. A West Side Hill that Helps the Neighborhood's Poor Families.

From the New York Sun. At the foot of West Ninety-sixth street are a number of coal pockets where thousands of tons of coal are stored. All day long endless strings of wagons carry the coal from the pockets to the yards all

From the river front up to Amsterdam avenue, a distance of three blocks, there is a very steep incline, one of the steepest in the city. Each coal firm has extra teams of horses standing at the foot of the incline, ready to be hitched to assist the other horses up the hill. When the trucks are being dragged up the incline, the wagon is thrown back to such an angle that the coal begins to roll and shift and gradually works its way back until by the time the truck reaches the top of the incline a good deal has fallen from the wagon into the street. From a hundred wagons or more the verflow is considerable. There are some very poor families in that section of the West Side and most of them take advantage of the opportunity to gather up free coal. About noon time after a number of wagons have passed over the ground groups of these poor people come around supplied with all kinds pots and pails to gather up the stray
